4. History

The region that remained sacred and majestic with its abundant watersheds, mountain slopes and its sparkling vegetation hails its name from the word Vuriloche which means 'People from behind the mountain'. Bariloche was discovered by man thousands of years ago, after the glaciations burst into the valley of Nahuel Huapi. The former residents of the city were Tehuelche people, however it was in the late 18th century when the Puelches and the Pehuenches discovered the city, followed by the Araucanos who soon controlled the whole of Patagonia and managed to spread their culture and traditions among the former inhabitants. However by the year 1872 Argentinian authorities discovered Bariloche and soon starting with its expeditions to conquer the area and just 8 years later the army conquered some of the native territories and moved forward to explore the region. The year 1892 saw white settlers from North America and Germany, and soon the population increased and people indulged themselves into exporting wool, potato, leather, cheese etc which led to trade and commerce in the city. Agriculture and Cattle raising were the main businesses of people living by the lake. The town soon attracted sawmills, dairy farms and silversmiths which would establish new opportunities for the city. In the year 1901 a group of Swiss immigrants arrived to the city which gave birth to the multi-cultural diversity and a heterogeneous population. The co-existence of different cultures led to the development of the city, with new roads, infrastructural buildings, parks, plazas coming up. Today the city stands as one of the most explored in the whole country.

5. Cultural identity

Being the 8th largest country in the world, Argentina boasts of a multi cultural society that blends almost all the European cultures to form something of its own. Often referred to as the land of Football and Tango, the country is like a platter of different cultures that defines its identity. The cultures dominating the country include Spanish, British, Italian and French, accompanied by African and their own gaucho culture. Since Argentina's culture is not a unique culture, the social rules and obligations are different from each other, however social classes are classified with the upper and lower class. The architectural style of the cities is influenced by its colonial history and is well supported by the Italian and french neo-classical architecture. Coming to the traditional cuisines, Argentina is the biggest consumers of red meat and one will also find beef in almost all the dishes. Asado is a popular food, which is essentially barbecue, one is also likely to find French-style cuisines at special occasions. Although Argentina is home to a variety of folk music and dance forms, Tango is the most popular form of music and dance and is considered to be a musical symbol of the country. The country is also known to have a rich literary history and continues to do so with emerging poets and authors.
