Some of the best museums and historic sites of Maryland are located here. It also has some lovely parks, vibrant theaters, and opportunities for watersports. Tourists can visit the William Paca House and Garden which was the home of a signer of the Declaration of Independence. It has a 2 acre garden with five terraces. They can see the history of boat building and the local oyster industry in Annapolis Maritime Museum. Apart from the above stated points, there are few other significance for the city. The Treaty of Paris was signed here in compliance with ending the Revolutionary war and homes of Maryland signers of the declaration of Independence are still preserved here. Annapolis was the capital of the country when the Treaty of Paris was signed.

4. History

Annapolis is the capital city of Maryland about 48 kilometers away from the east of Washington, D.C. The city is well known for catering huge conventions and conferences, such as the Annapolis Peace Conference held in 2007. The city has undergone a series of names before it was being officially called as Annapolis. Originally, the Puritan settlers named the capital city of Maryland as the Providence. The Puritan exiles were the one who founded the city in 1649, but was officially incorporated in 1708. It later became Anne Arundel's Towne termed after the late wife of Lord Baltimore.

5. Cultural identity

Theatrical performances are one of the most popular attractions in Annapolis. Some of the plays are considered as their seasonal tradition, for instance, A Christmas Carol. The city is also a home of superb paintings and photography displayed in around 20 different art galleries. On the other hand, history also left incredible sites, monuments, and artifacts which are exhibited in city museums like the Banneker-Douglass Museum and U.S Navy Museum.

Index*6. Natural resources

There are not many natural resources in the city of Annapolis. However, there are abundance of natural resources in the state of Maryland due to its favorable fertile soil in many locations. One can find natural resources, in Maryland, like wood, fish and wildlife, and water. Several plans are in progress to organize the resources and identify the potential risks which could impact cultural resources such as natural disaster. Proper mitigation plan is developed to implement this idea and monitor the progress.
