1. Geographical location

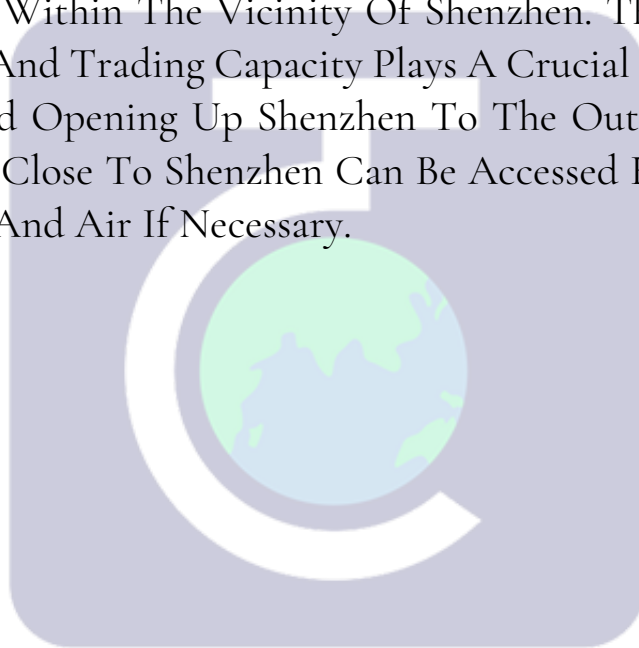

Shenzhen is found towards the southern part of china and has a population that is above ten million people. Its municipality area covers a total of up to 2050 sq. km. Shenzhen is found within the river delta of the Pearl River. The city is fed with over one hundred and fifty rivers. Towards the south, Shenzhen borders Hong Kong and Dong Guan to the Northeast. Once being a hilly and agriculturally rich area of china, its discovery as a special economic zone resulted in a staggering transformation in its landscape as of 1979. Most of the hills have since been leveled to create suitable land for development.

4. History

Shenzhen was once known as “Bao’on” which depicted the beauty and peace that the region beheld. As late as 1979, Shenzhen was fishing and farming village, before it was established as Special Economic Zone with the Pearl River Delta region. Going back in time, Shenzhen was salt monopoly region during the Han dynasty and thus managed to retain imperial protection. The earliest records of the city can be traced back to 1410 during the Ming dynasty. From a population of a little over thirty thousand people, Shenzhen has managed to rise to become one of the biggest metropolises in the world with a population of over 18 million people.

5. Cultural identity

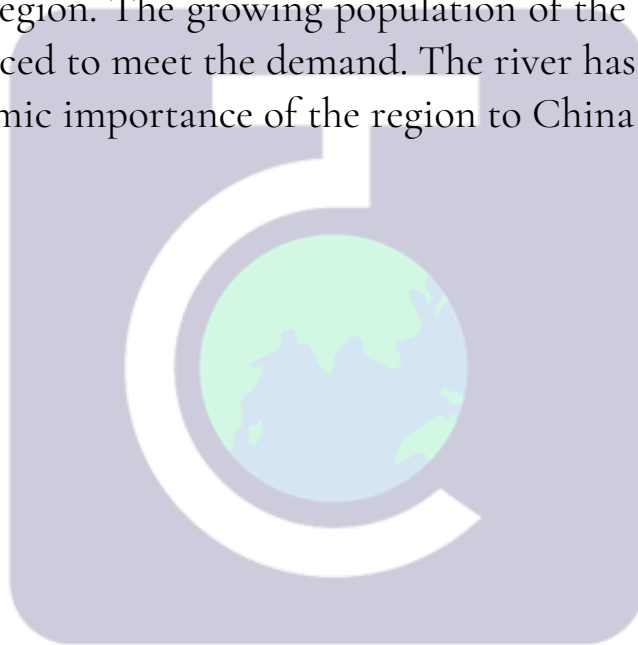

As an economic and trade hub, Shenzhen has experienced a great deal of cultural evolution over the years. The culture of a society is a great reflection of its beliefs and practices. A significant proportion of the population in Shenzhen is composed of people with a high standard of living. Most of the elderly population sticks to the traditional language and as such communicating with them might be a bit challenging. The same cannot be said for the younger generation which is well versed in the English language. Another notable feature of the population in Shenzhen is the innumerable festivals and events that are held every other time of the year.

6. Natural resources

Shenzhen is a coastal city and as such water is one of its greatest resources. Shenzhen is a port city that is located on the Pearl River Delta which is an important economy influence for Shenzhen. The Pearl River remains an instrumental mode of transportation into and out of the city. Agriculture is another resource that is made possible by the sufficient water and suitable environment in the region. The growing population of the city meant that more food had to be produced to meet the demand. The river has been instrumental in redefining the economic importance of the region to China and to the rest of the world.
